

Driving Hyper Growth

You have 7 open positions, 10 new customers to onboard, and you've had to silence Slack because the wins channel is constantly blowing up.
This. Is. Awesome.

All this growth is counting on you. Your evergrowing to-do list has gone from ambitious to aspirational to delusional. And the worst part is your teams feel the stress too.

If only you had more hours in the day. The problem is time.

Report in real-time

Keep your teams' eyes on the prize. Keeping teams focused on goals has been shown to make the goal feel 30% closer, feel 17% easier, and increases speed by 23%. You get a productivity bump without lifting a finger!

Prepare to add more plan types

You'll be adding new roles segmented by sales motion, specialized roles by vertical or territory, and management layers. Build a CRM data strategy to make sure you can support this reporting.

Double-comp is ok

You will probably grow without perfectly codified "Rules of Engagement". It's ok if you overpay a little at this stage as long as you are learning what value each role is bringing to the customer.

SPIF on losses

You need to figure out how to keep growing. Better understanding the verticals, territories, or segments where you are losing deals will help you make investments to sustain your growth!

Don't undervalue your time

Get off the spreadsheet. It's an afterthought to you and it feels that way to your team. We get it; the math isn't that hard, which is exactly why it's the type of thing you should not do manually. Only spend your time on activities that drive productivity.

Your sales comp strategy should meet the needs of the business:
increase individual productivity and identifies growth opportunities with real-time reporting, and flexibility.
